Trump offers his vision for putting 'America 1st'

WASHINGTON

Fresh off primary wins, candidate looks inward in foreign policy speech

BY MARK LANDLER AND ASHLEY PARKER

Donald J. Trump, fresh from a string of resounding primary victories in the Northeast, on Wednesday presented a foreign policy that he said would put "America first," castigating President Obama and Hillary Clinton for missteps in the Middle East that he said had disillusioned the nation's allies and emboldened its rivals.

Mr. Trump, the Republican front-runner, pledged a massive buildup of the military, the swift destruction of the Islamic State, and the rejection of trade deals and other agreements that he said tied the nation's hands. But he pointedly rejected the nation-building of the George W. Bush administration, reminding his audience he had opposed the Iraq war.

"America is going to be strong again; America is going to be great again; it's going to be a freer again," Mr. Trump declared. "We're going to finally have a coherent foreign policy, based on American interests and the shared interests of our allies."

"The world must know that we do not go abroad in search of enemies, that we are always happy when old enemies become friends and when old friends become allies; that's what we want," Mr. Trump said.
